so, i think

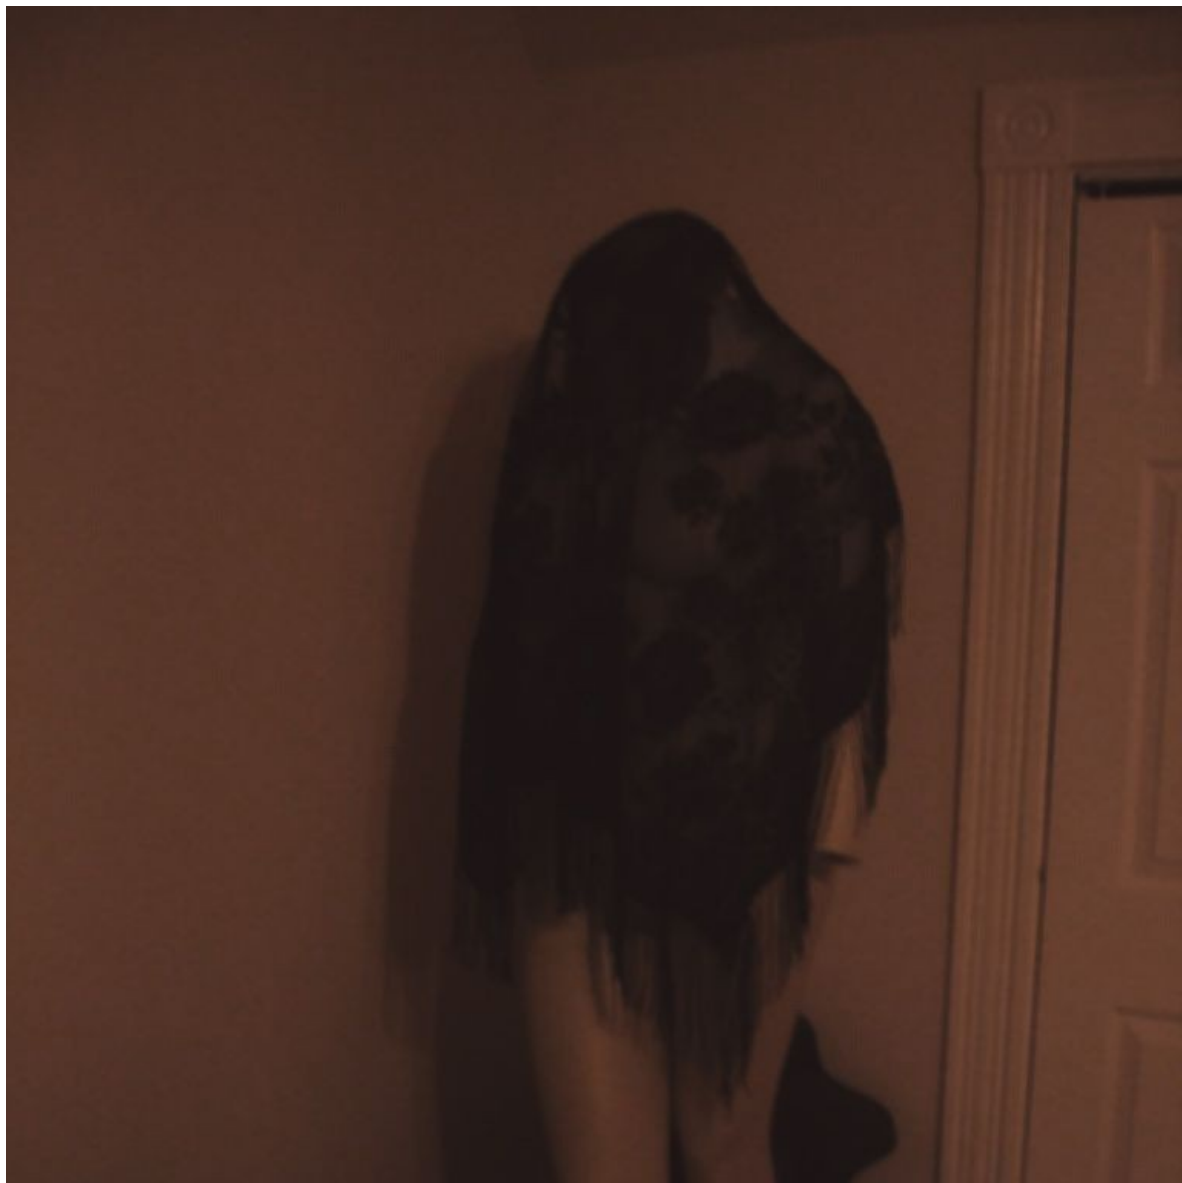

social media isn't truthful, but it can be honest. we all know there's a level of editing involved. even with that awareness, we struggle to measure how it affects our self-esteem. we shape narratives. we manage how others see our social capital. we leave out what we can't explain in the moment. we live in an age of public authenticity—striving to appear real. decision and action have replaced anonymity and introspection. calling social media good or bad misses the point. it's powerful. it's destructive. it's freeing. it's distracting.

these photos and pieces of art aren't chronological. some date back decades. i posted them to a particularly square platform between march 3, 2019, and december 18, 2020.

i approached this zine with the intent to be comprehensive . . . more or less. the goal is to archive this one account and delete it forever. it covers a wide stretch of my life

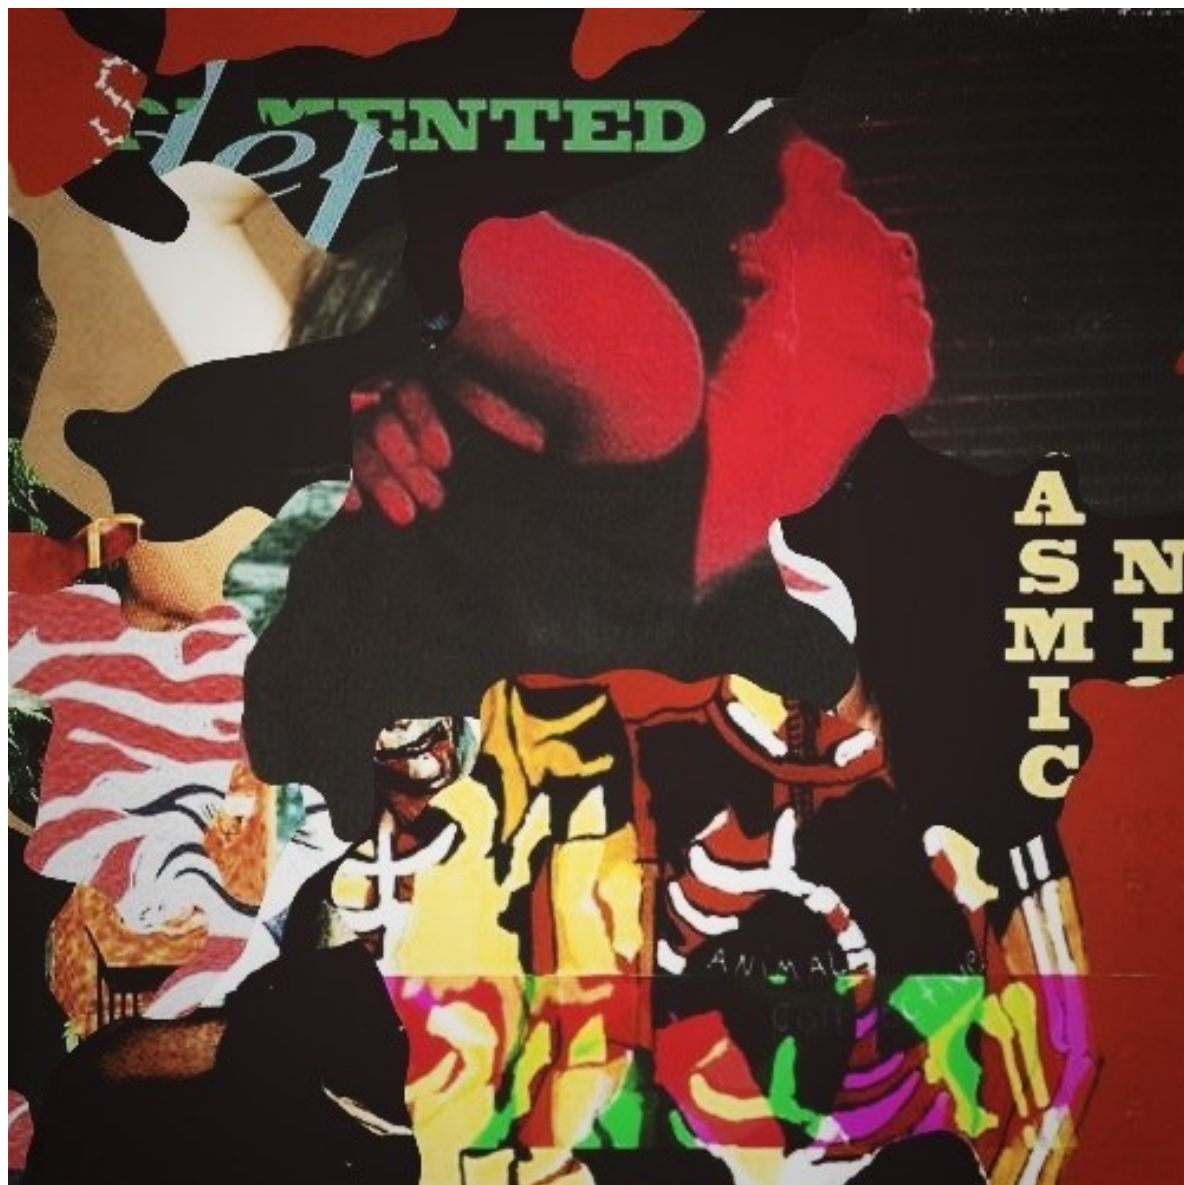

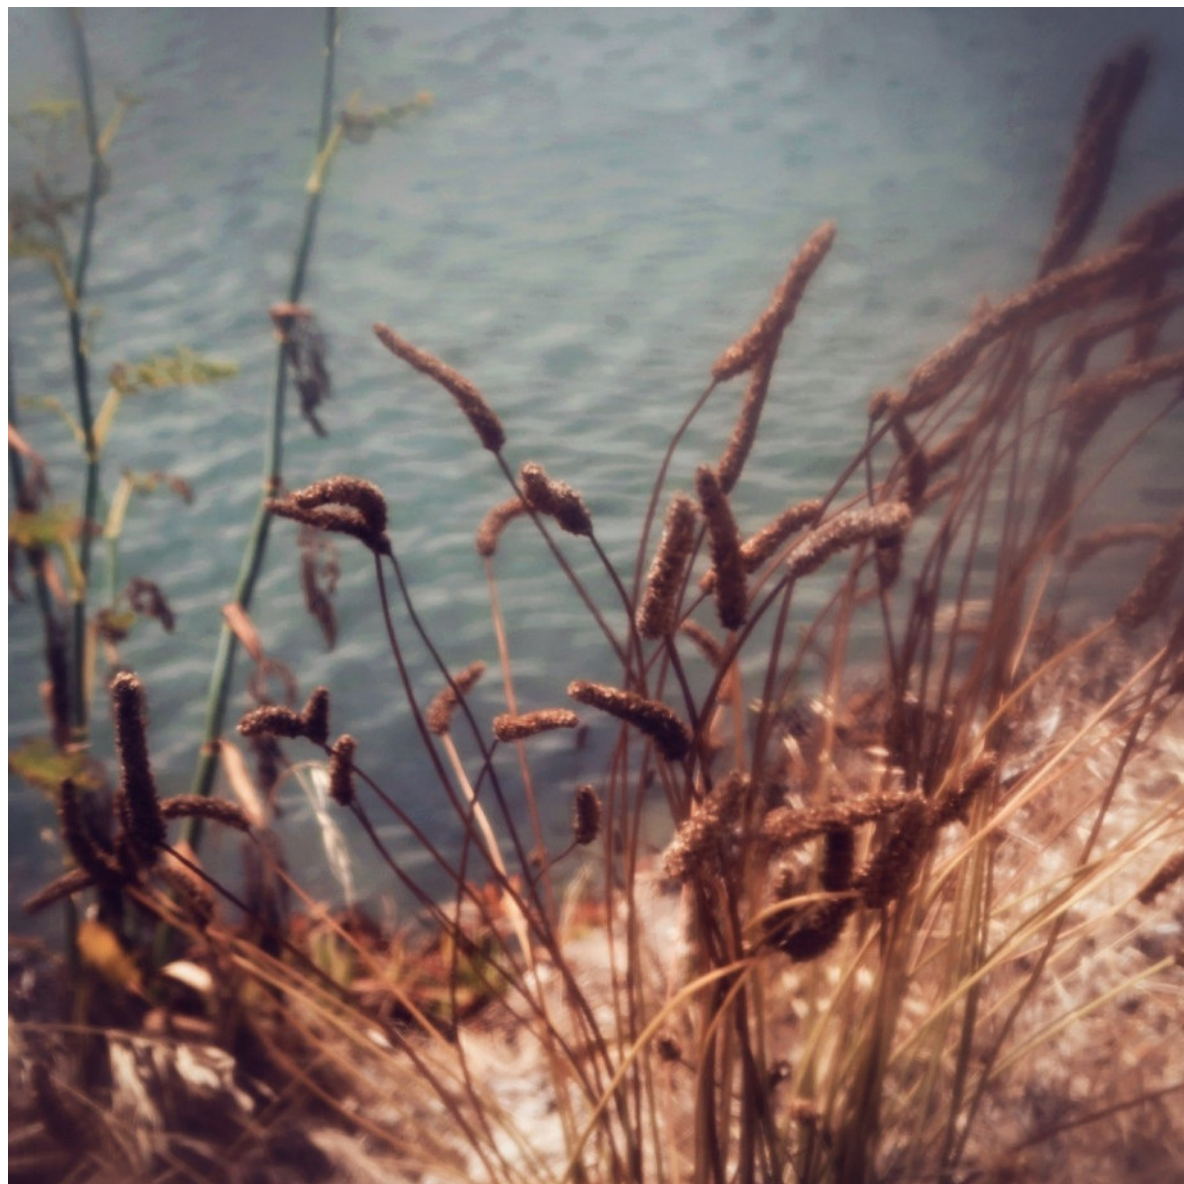

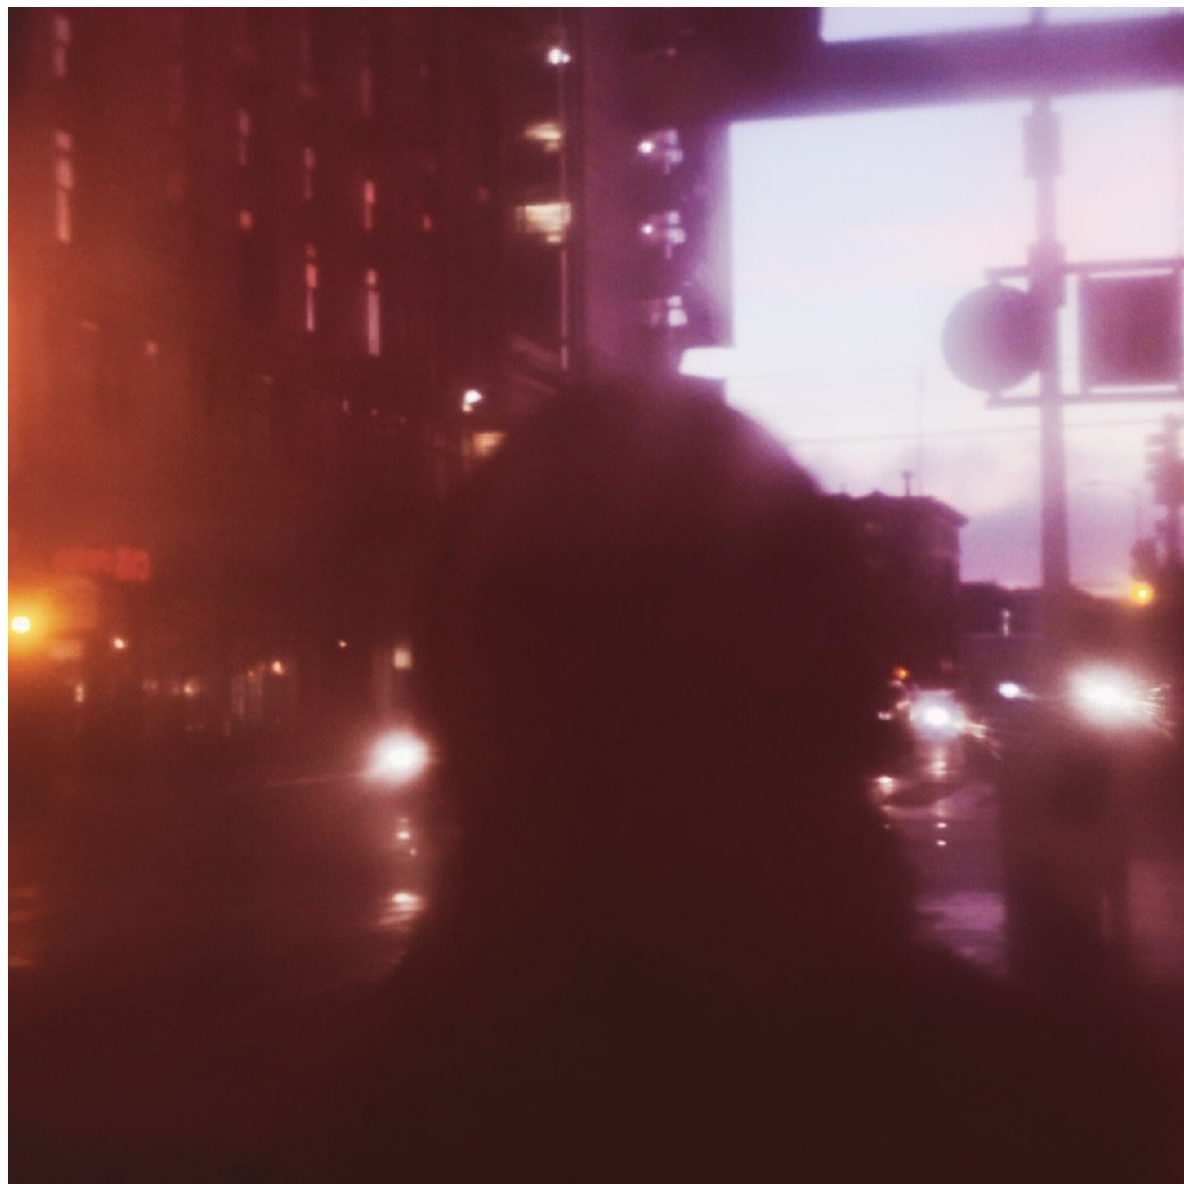

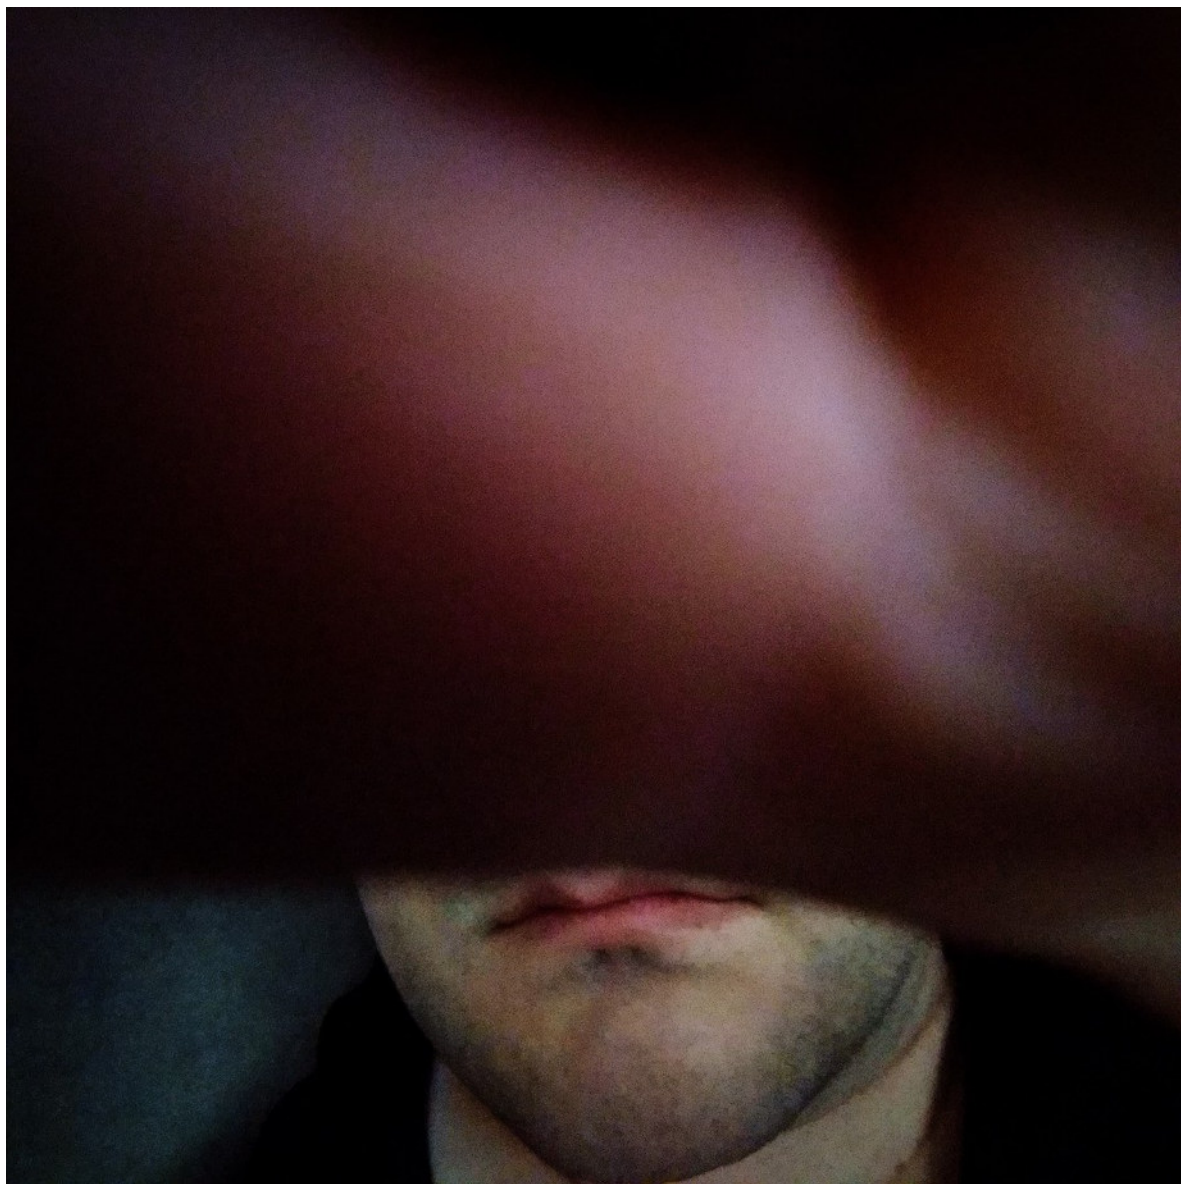

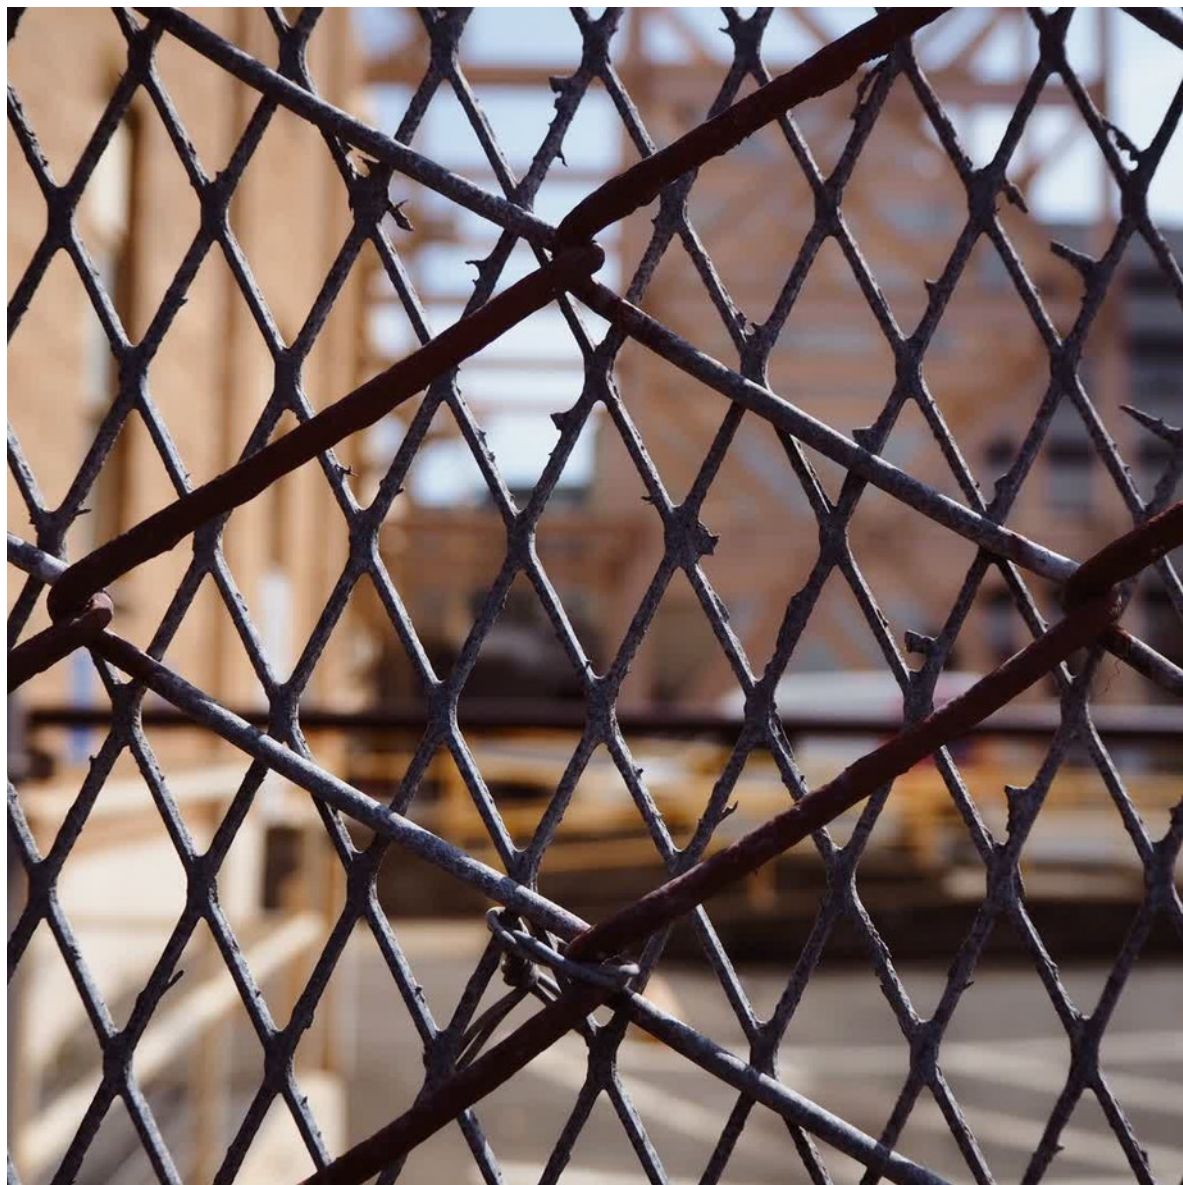

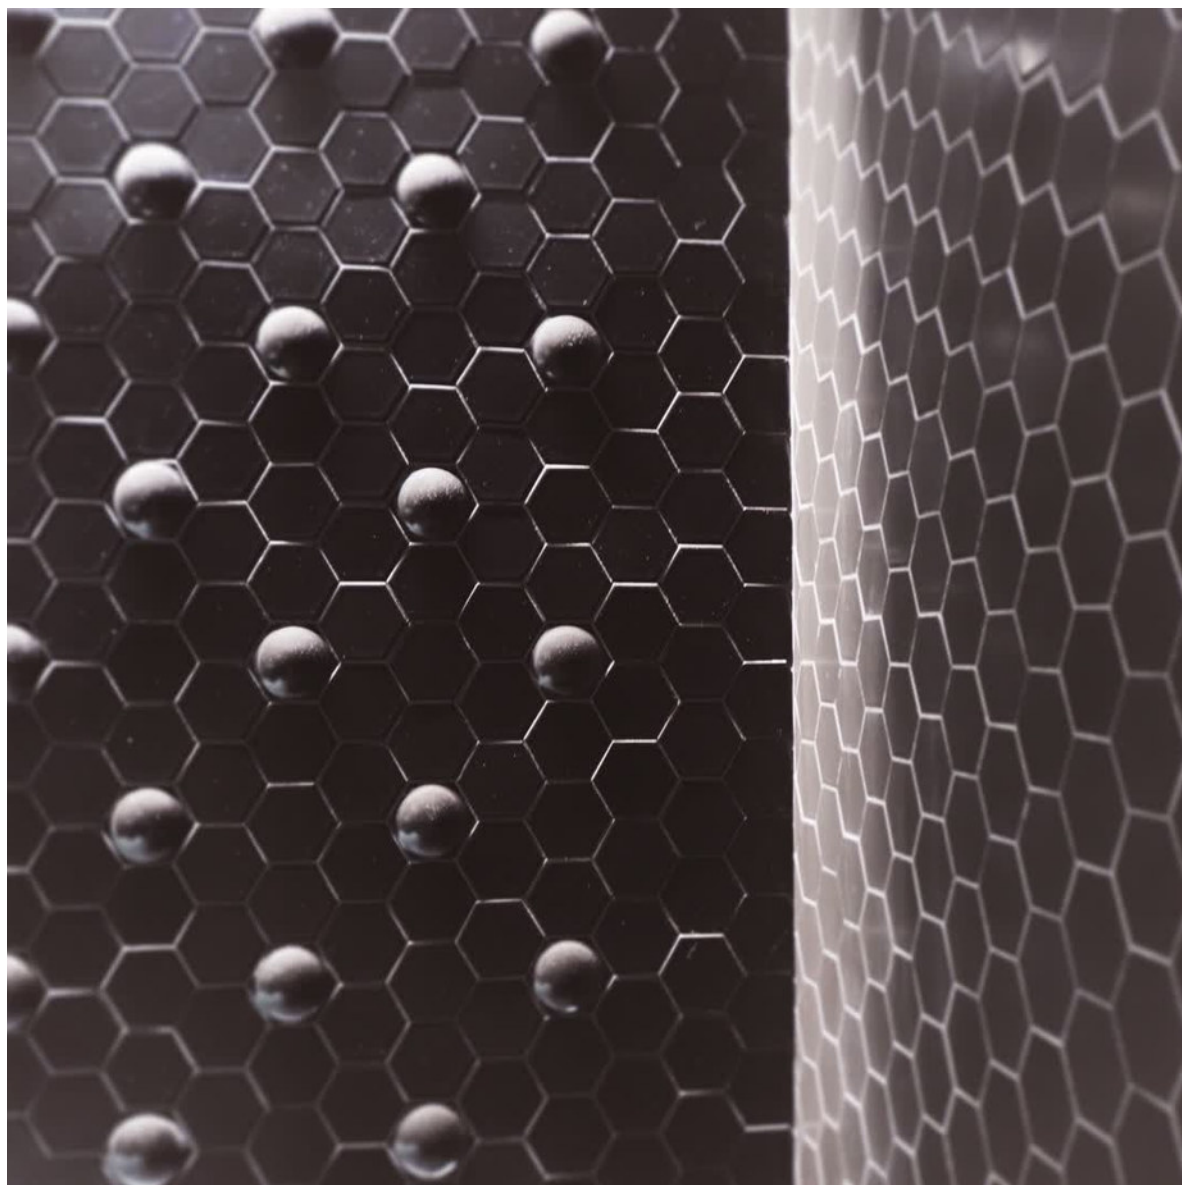

my shopping cart.
e difference.

I hate,
